

Cramming is fundamentally wrong on all levels and apparently the Senate has recognized this. It is amazing to me that they are satisfied with only part of the reasonable fix but maybe that is their way of playing both sides of the fence. All phone companies need to be required to inform customers that they can block any and all third-party charges but it also needs to include requiring all companies to allow users to opt-out of these charges -- the proposed rule change should require phone companies to make this option available. Set up protection for the whole problem.
