

"If passed, the final proposed rule could fundamentally change the entire cramming problem: It would require many phone companies to inform customers that they can block any and all third party charges. However, not all companies allow users to opt-out of these charges -- and the proposed rule change would not require phone companies to make this option available."

If your going to fix something, fix it.

Other than that, you just look like any other half @$ $ lame Governmental regulation that does nothing.