

Google Fiber sure sounds like a great service offering. If reports are true that Google also plans to offer video services it can really give big cable and telecom companies a run for their money that is provide some real competition in the broadband market which is in dire need of more competition, innovation and consumer choice. Right now we have Verizon Wireless seeking to enter into non-competitive marketing agreements with the cable cartel which could result in the discontinuation of FIOS Internet and TV services. For that very reason and concerns about wireless spectrum concentration I oppose Verizon's bid to acquire spectrum licenses from Cox Communications and the cable companies affiliated with SpectrumCo. If Verizon wants to ditch its land-line fiber to the home broadband Internet network, phone and TV services to cement its existing wireless dominance I fail to see how this would benefit consumers. I join with public interest groups Free Press, Media Access Project, and others opposed to the deal.
