

It is not only unconscionable to accept the fact that people are still without decent Internet access, but it's also unethical. We know that the technology exists to make Internet access available to everyone. When my children have special projects such as science fairs, I have to bring them to my work place where there is high speed Internet so that they can complete the required components so as to get a good grade. The playing field remains terribly inequitable if only some people have access to the kinds of technology upon which school curriculums are based. What is a family without at least access to DSL supposed to do when their child's teacher chooses to web enhance a course, using e-books? Please encourage broadband providers to forego on profits until this country is equally served with decent internet access. Satellite Internet is no alternative. Too slow.
