

Dear FCC,

I do not think it is a good idea for security services to suspend wireless service, especially in crisis circumstances. In an emergency, the public will need to use wireless service and cell service to contact loved ones and find out what to do. The suspension of wireless service could make a disaster go from bad to worse to catastrophic. Would it have been a good idea for security services to suspend wireless service during 9/11 (presuming the security services could have done so at the time)? No, the suspension of wireless services would have interfered with the public's right to communicate, including in desperate times and situations. The likelihood is very small that the security services will not interfere with legitimate calls. Imagine a world less full of the loving messages that went forth from scared victims to family members during the crisis of 9/11. The security services have no right and no business interrupting these kinds of calls, or any calls made by the public.
