

I would like to know how and why the cellphone carriers are able to charge so much for phone service when basically they have towers, not miles and miles of phone poles and phone lines. Who set the pricing? How do we as consumers change this? Also, why are they not required to put out a phone book of all consumers who have phones through their company? It has proven to be very difficult to find a phone number for anyone since the landline is most likely going to be extinct. It would make it less difficult for law enforcement as well, since prior they could just look in a phone book, now they have to get warrants, etc, to access phone records. It just seems to stupid and poorly thought out. I just now have a cellphone, because I am relocating and needed something for the interim, but I loved my landline. I am just saying.
