

I am opposed to any working agreement between Verison and Time-Warner. There is too little competition on the internet now, and any more collaboration between big businesses is going to be bad for consumers.

In despotic countries, the government controls the internet, frequently using American technology. Wouldn't it be ironic if in the United States, control of the internet fell into the hands of a cabal of large businesses, working together?

Also, I find your website hard to use. It is hard to find the text of the proceeding, and it is hard to figure out if the proceeding I am commenting about is in fact the correct one. In my case, I was pointed to the right place by a mass E-mail. Had the E-mail not pointed me to the right place, it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to find it. Are you, the FCC, in the pocket of the very businesses you claim you regulate? Are we too late?
