

I am opposed to anything that creates a monopoly, and that is what the Verizon and Comcast deal is going to do. Customers should have a choice and it is good to have competition because then companies have to try harder and it will result in better services being offered. That's a win-win solution for everyone. But if these companies are allowed to consolidate their operations to the point where one company is indistinguishable from another, there is no incentive for them to provide anything more than mediocre service to customers. I think it is also important to keep the companies separate to stimulate the economy by providing more jobs at a time when we need them the most.
