

Almont, Michigan, a small town of 6,041 people, lacks affordable and reliable LTE. A new, wholesale, nationwide mobile broadband network would help out tremendously--for all three of my kids doing school work or playing games, for my husband watching YouTube videos, and for me, researching everything from the next potential cancer treatment to the best Black Friday sales.