

Re: Reply to Revolution Messaging

In summary, Revolution Messaging seems to argue that they should get to send unsolicited text messages to mobile phones because it is reasonable that consumers should be stuck with the cost and invasion of privacy of sending "free" speech messages.

Hogwash! By that logic, they should be able to write their message on a sheet of paper, wrap that around a rock, and throw it through my front window. After all, by their logic, "political speech is different and citizens may have to bear some cost of receiving political speech." So, by their logic, it should be perfectly fine to throw a rock through my window every night with their "political speech" wrapped around it.

There is a right of free speech, but I don't believe that right extends to using my property and my money to deliver that message nor to enter my property to deliver that message.
