

More media consolidation means consumers will be stuck with less diversity and localism and more celebrity gossip, sensationalism and tabloid journalism. We have seen even CNN become less reliable for news with the only actual journalists on that cable news channel remaining being folks like Wolf Blitzer, Candy Crowley and Anderson Cooper. Instead CNN is sadly becoming more like Fox News and MSNBC with political commentary from partisan commentators. MSNBC is already the equivalent of the right wing Fox News for the left CNN was the last remaining commercial cable news channel with any credibility left in reporting actual news and doing real investigative reporting. Just look at some of CNN's programs. Former British tabloid news editor Piers Morgan has his own show now on CNN. Piers Morgan replaced Larry King (who is now in retirement) on CNN and basically interviews celebrities and occasionally politicians and their campaign staffers. It's trashy celebrity gossip. The last thing we need is more tabloid journalism, celebrity gossip and sensationalism on the radio dial, TV and the Internet.
