Dear Chairman Genachowski:

My wife and I, who are both engineers for major companies based out of Michigan, live out in the country. We absolutely love it; minus the fact that our internet service options are very limited. As an engineer, I have a hard time understanding why this is still the case in the year 2013.

There are too few companies providing mobile broadband network services and that is hurting the interests of the public. We need to see an increase in competition. It is an established economic fact that competition benefits everyone, even the competitors.

The FCC is in a perfect position to add to the competition in this industry. As you know, LightSquared has been actively trying to enter the market. The company has taken the necessary steps so that they can immediately start providing service. Their proposal warrants approval.

Please do everything you can you push forward LightSquared's pending request. We need the added competition and the benefits we all will derive from this new player in the field.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Peter Moegling
