Dear Chairman Genachowski:

My daily commute to work is over 65 miles and that includes travelling through rural areas. At times there is a lack of signal for my cell phone which is troubling, especially since I typically travel alone. Anything that the Federal Communications Commission can do to help improve that situation will be helpful, such as adding more service providers. I also believe that the greater competition between these companies will help address the growing costs for the service they provide.

LightSquared has a proposal that I feel will help address both of my concerns. Once they are allowed to proceed, the issues of increased costs and reliability stand a much better chance of improving for the consumer.

I ask that the FCC do everything possible to expedite this proposal.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Debbie Whipple
