

I think that network television censorship standards should be slightly looser. I think that after, say, 9 or 10PM (which I believe is the current watershed time), shows should be able to use whatever language they like. I also think that they should be able to show body parts and sexual acts, as long as they do not show the genitalia specifically. I believe that breasts and behinds should be allowed. I feel that pay cable is able to do more groundbreaking work because they can show these things, and I'd like the networks to be able to compete in that way, allowing creators to make groundbreaking pieces of television through whichever means they like. I agree that before 9 or 10PM, the standards should be essentially the same, so that children won't stumble across anything too damaging. But I feel that after that time of night, children of a certain age should be asleep. If they are awake at that time, the parents should have to answer for it, not the networks. The networks shouldn't have to be censored so harshly because irresponsible parents or guardians are allowing their children to watch inappropriate TV so late at night.
