

Sirs:

I understand you are considering once again lowering the national standards of what is considered "acceptable" for all Americans to view on television and radio, exposing children and adults with some remaining sense of civility, decency, and a sense of values to even more trash. If this turns out to be the case, the majority of Americans, who I believe don't want their children exposed to the "f" word nor to more nudity, will be pushed into the corner once again by pressure from the networks, who are after all, primarily interested in sales and ratings. You are responsible for a standard; I hope you will hang on to some semblance of one for the sake of decency. Any of you who are parents and grandparents must surely have a better answer than "you'll just have to monitor viewing". Please stand up for what is just "doing the right thing."
