

I am one of the, no doubt, countless Americans being asked to bombard the Commission with e-mails to encourage you NOT to drop your ban on some forms of current censorship. I have been in any number of countries, and they are obviously more laid back and less uptight about nudity than we are in the US. And, while I am an older and definitely more conservative than many if not most Americans, I see no problem with this trend. Beaches, worldwide, have topless female sunbathers, and there is no indication that morality has gone to hell. It actually seems that tensions are less in those locales I've visited. Currently, I see no issue with frontal nudity on television in the US, as long as it is not pornographic sex.

That said, I do have some reservations on the "normal" use of the F-word. Late night television...after 10 p.m...with proper advance notification would be the proper regulations used. Honestly, frontal nudity after 10 might even help broadcasters with the declining viewership broadcasters are facing. Another argument is that anyone has access to as much internet T&A he wants. The internet, of course, is generally unregulated
