

In my lifetime I have watched standards of decency progressively erode, and I have yet to see any redeeming social value in their being allowed to do so. I strongly urge the FCC to not relax current standards on language and nudity. There are already plenty of alternatives for folks that crave such forms of "artistic expression". If the FCC finds itself reluctant or incapable of forming and applying broadcast standards (especially decency) then what useful purpose does it serve? Other responsibilities like frequency allocations could be handled by a much smaller, more cost-effective bureaucracy. Has the FCC outlived its usefulness?
