

Some group called One Million moms sent me a letter urging me to give you my opinion so here goes.

Let's look at what kids can already see on television at the moment: Extreme violence both simulated and from live footage, illegal activities being glorified like gang violence and grand theft, not to mention the never ending stream of CSI: this or that.

This one million moms group seems to ignore the macho, unrealistic depiction of violence and death. If anything, children are learning about very intense ideas like death and pain from unreliable sources that spin death into some kind of headline or attraction.

If parents absolutely must block their children from seeing what real life is like, there are countless ways to censor you cable set, to say in this modern world you cannot control the television is a lie. In the end it comes down to this, television is paid for, created by, and mostly distributed to adults. television shouldn' even be a child's focus, we should find things to pass the time when we've finished learning about the world around us. To say all adults should experience a watered down version of entertainment simply because some 10 year old may hear fuck is absurd, I mean honestly, those children will find all of these things out in middle school anyway.
