

I urge the FCC to uphold TV standards so that innocent kids will not be further exposed to any more of the crude language or graphic content which has already crept into schools and other places. Some may argue that these rules are archaic, unenlightened, etc. To them I would say that keeping them in place will do no harm, and removing protections against inappropriate content can do great harm to those who are not developed enough to discriminate between uplifting, positive content, and the run-of-the-mill trash that is broadcast wholesale throughout the world.

I hope that the FCC will continue to maintain high standards for American broadcast companies.

Thank you.

Sincerely, Tim Sellers
