

i'm a student at brigham young university. I was going to go into film, but now I am a pre dental student, finishing up my junior year. I come from a large family, and I think public tv is and should remain what it is public television. public television is watched by the child as much as the adult. i know this because grew up in a large elementary, jr. high and high school, had many friends, and extensive extended family. we watched tv dramas as a family. it is and always should remain a question of what is morally correct for general public, and what is indecent, will and always be indecent. compare it to a woman walking shirtless in an airport, that is not acceptable and never should be! but the 72"tv screen in the same airport has an actress doing just that and it is? Its senseless, its tasteless, and really meant only to attract for what will only be a limited time, more viewers by introducing pornographic content, and stronger, well, lets use: less intelligent language. pornographic, and crude television, is what this is, please dont try to justify or hide it behind words, which if we are using crude language it seems the writer doesnt have much of a better vocabulary anyway, and probably needs to pick up an oxford. point of the matter is, shouldnt this be obvious? is this really a matter of what is right and wrong, which should be spelled out as clear as day? do we really want to expose the american public at any age to indecently clothed frontal images of women and saying the f word, on the same channel as the president makes his public announcements? how embarrassing for our culture and people.
