

I support the f-word.

It's been used to bash some people over the head for ages, and others consider it vulgar to invoke, but realistically, it's something that even our founding fathers were not willing to say unless they felt it necessary.

Right now, with a bunch of people trying to tell me what I can and can't watch or enjoy on TV, we need to take a good solid look at what is going on in America, and take a stand, and let those folks know that if they think they can dictate what's said on tv, that's completely wrong.

It's not the role of anyone to say what is or isn't allowable, and for others to tell me that I can't say the f-word in front of my imaginary children that I'm invoking solely because that makes me seem slightly more important, then so help me, I will beat them with pretend love.

If the following sentence seemed terribly off putting, then imagine how terrible it should seem for other people be held back from the basics of English language now commonly used, let alone completely fine for a dictionary, yet we for whatever reason feel the need to coddle grown adults.

I support the F-Word.

I support Freedom.

I don't support people trying to beat others up using their imaginary logic and supposed moral fallacies, because who's to say what's right and wrong for someone to see, it's ultimately the individuals role in any civilized society to draw the appropriate conclusion to their own end, but how are they supposed to do such a thing, if they can't see the fundamentals of any free society, be they full frontal nudity or cussing.
