

As computers and cable supercede radio and broadcast television in importance, censoring the latter mediums does little to shield children from inappropriate content. Modern televisions and DVRs allow parents to filter out this content more effectively and specifically than broad policy ever could - and therefore I support any effort to expand what content is permitted on TV and radio.

Networks will police themselves to make themselves attractive to advertisers and parents - as already happens in cable. There is no need for continued government censorship on public airwaves.
