

We all understand that parents have the right to censor their own children. However people should not have the right to force their own personal beliefs about censorship onto other parents, therefore the FCC has a duty to protect parent's right to choose for themselves what is appropriate for their children.

The rating system is in place to allow parents the ability to judge what is appropriate for their children. An out-rite ban on nudity and the F-word is therefore unnecessary, as well as a clear violation of the broadcaster's first amendment rights.

Broadcasters make programing to fit a target audience. So parents wont have to worry about nudity during children's programing.

Many other countries refuse to ban such things on their programs. Yet we don't see any harm coming from that. Therefore it is safe to conclude that these bans are unnecessary and infringe on every parent's rights to determine for themselves what is appropriate for their children.
