

Changes to the current FCC indecency standards is a large mistake for at least three reasons.

First, making this change is not just adjusting a simple policy -- it's affecting what goes into a person's home, which then affects the entire society as a whole. It might be argued that people can control what goes into their home or not, but the people this day in age demonstrate on a daily basis that entertainment comes before control.

Second, showing nudity, even if it isn't considered sexual in nature by vote or a committee, will only help create more porn addicts. That means the chances of rape, incest, and other unwanted sexual acts will increase. (On a side note, nearly all prominent killers in the U.S. within the last 50 years have stated their acts began with an addiction to pornography.)

Finally, the likelihood of the American population becoming more vulgar in their language at school, work, and other professional settings is high.

I hope you consider my response as meaningful.
