

I believe there should be changes made to the current broadcast indecency policies. A slip of the tongue, or even a swear word S*** or F*** at the end of the day... is a word just like the word Hate! All three words can be used in a bad way or "hurt feelings". But all three can also be used in a non hateful way. Lawmakers should not be judge and jury over how people speak. If listeners for example, to a tv show or radio program don't like what they hear - they can simply turn it off as it is their choice. Controlling how people speak has gotten way out of control. As for children hearing any of this sort of language - again, it is all words. They hear this out in the real world away from television and radio and most likely at home and in school. It is the parents responsibility to "teach and guide" their children with manners and morals and also about the real world. Just because someone swears on TV doesn't mean they have to do it too. It is not the FCC's job to wrap the human race in cotton wool so that they don't have to hear certain things or see certain things. Besides the internet ruins that concept anyway along with the outside influence called... life! These things will be heard and seen regardless of your choices, that is fact. But your choices can make you look like a money hungry bulley! The FCC should not be ruler of the air! And issuing fines for people who do speak a certain way or have a slip is ridiculous and power hungry. When will people stop thinking they can control others? Or more importantly "should". It's nonsense and just another way to rip people (businesses who pay taxes and license fees)off just because a certain "few" will complain! Our world has much bigger problems than hearing the word F*** . The real problem lies with the people who do hear such a word and then waste time out of what little they have on this earth to complain about it. Do the right thing!
