

Relaxing current indecency standards would not serve the public interest. Exposing listeners and viewers to indecent words and images has a detrimental effect, particularly on children who may be tuned in. I don't want to hear them or see them as an adult either.

The US Supreme Court has upheld the FCC's authority to enforce the current indecency policies, especially when children are likely to be watching. There is no need to relax them.

I support standards that prevent children and adults from being exposed to indecent material.

Expletives and nudity are not appropriate on a public medium, especially where children might be exposed.