

I would applaud dropping the bans on profanity and nudity as appropriate progress. Censorship of that nature is outdated, arbitrary, and pointless. I am, and feel anyone claiming to represent or value this country's founding principles should be, against suppressing free expression solely on the grounds that said expression may be considered offensive. If one does not want to see or hear it, one may choose to not watch it or listen to it. It really is just that simple. Its presence absolutely does not constitute infringement of anyone's rights.

I would also like to briefly point out that response to this proposed change may inaccurately appear disproportionately negative, as backwards-activist group One Million Moms is sending its followers here en masse, to push their agenda.
