

The FCC should not lower its current television/radio standards for nudity and profanity. We have already had to censor what we want to watch during daytime/evening viewing while our children are around. (We used to catch up on a lot of our television or rerun tv then. Because a lot of it is already inappropriate for our minor children to view, we watch a lot less.)

People who don't mind viewing television with nudity and lots of profanity can already subscribe to networks that have lower standards, such as HBO. I enjoy cable television but do not want to subject myself to more of this. I am the role model for my children, and it is easier to become more lax with my own language when desensitized to it through television and music. I enjoy the censored radio music that I would never purchase myself because of the "missing" content.
