

I am a firm believer in the freedom of speech and believe that it is unconstitutional for the FCC to levy fines upon individuals or organizations for broadcasting anything, and especially for "off-the cuff" or "fleeting" remarks. While I do understand parents and their interest groups are concerned over what their children may be viewing, it is ultimately their responsibility to guard what they deem suitable in parenting, not the FCC or any other governmental/regulatory body. The entertainment industry's ratings scheme is sufficient in this regard. I would hope the FCC has the common sense not to infringe on freedom of speech.
