

Regarding the FCC's consideration to relax standards on broadcast nudity and "profanity," the FCC should not only relax these standards, but abolish them entirely. To fine broadcasters for content is naked censorship, a flagrant violation of broadcasters' free speech rights as protected under the First Amendment. Allow broadcasters and viewers to agree on acceptable content using already-established ratings and customer feedback channels, as well as subscription models. It is not the proper role of government or any related agency to rate, censor, proscribe, or in any other way regulate the content of broadcasters and other forms of entertainment or communication media.
