

I understand the FCC is considering lowering the decency standards on broadcast TV. I am sincerely opposed to any lowering of decency standards. While many people subscribe to programming containing nudity and profanity, they have a plethora of places in which to find it already. However, there are also a lot of people who don't subscribe to such programming. They have been watching broadcast TV for years and have given it their trust because of the higher standards it maintains relative to paid programming. To lower these standards now would break viewers trust, harm society, and subject viewers of all ages to offensive material. This sort of viewing material should only be available in places where those seeking it will find it rather than in places where those attempting to avoid it might stumble upon it.

I respectfully request that the FCC do not lower decency standards on broadcast TV but maintain the level of trust and morality that this nation has maintained for generations.
