

I'm not sure what proceeding this is supposed to be under. But I was on my way home from work and heard on the radio that the FCC was considering dropping the ban on nudity and language on television and I feel that is not okay. I as a viewer would like to know that I (or my family) am not going to be subjected to that kind of viewing. If that passed, I know I would NOT watch as much TV because I feel they are already pushing the boundaries too far. I don't think adding nudity and foul language is going to get tv any place but TROUBLE. You are going to lose more viewers because of morals than you would gain viewers with no morals. If the tv stations are feeling they can't compete because they can't use nudity and foul language, then they need new writers and actors. Because any show should be able to compete with good quality tv. If the content is there, a naked body isn't going to make the show any better. Dropping the f-word isn't going to make the show more appealing..."Man I gotta watch that show because they drop the f-word!" It makes me sad to think our society is dropping its standards so low. What are we teaching our children? Are we setting any boundaries for people, ourselves, our children? Are we all about ourselves so much that we don't see what is good anymore? TV has a huge impact on people's lives, shouldn't we be sending the world messages of what we expect from our nation? I for one would be appalled if we stooped to those levels. I don't think I would watch TV (except for movies) because I would not know what could possibly be on and therefore I don't want to subject myself to that kind of lifestyle. Thank you very much, but if we have any say, if people want to see nudity or hear the f-word, rent a rated R movie or get Cable! Make that a personal choice, but don't punish the rest of us that want to watch quality TV.
