

I support the FCC in relaxing any censorship of television programming. The main arguments I have seen opposing relaxation of censorship are that someone's child might see something that the parents disagree with. The simplest solution then is to be a responsible parent and not rely on the government to police your child's programming. With the availability to set parental controls on televisions, cable boxes, cell phones, computers, etc., families that take an active role in the policing of content, can make the censorship as granular as they see fit. Asking the FCC to control another facet of what used to be the role of the parent is both lazy and irresponsible.

Anyone, at any age, at any time can access any content they want from the internet via computer, or mobile phone. The fear that someone's child might see something disagreeable is misplaced on television programming and the responsibility of the FCC. Ultimately, parents have a greater ability than the government to watch over their own children.
