

Broadcasters do not have a right to turn network television into a cesspool at the expense of children and those who wish to avoid the foul language and pornography that is now so common on cable television. Countless families forgo cable TV to avoid indecent material. That right should not be taken from them. The FCC must now enforce our right to decency on the public airwaves.