

Intel is attempting to redefine delivery of television and is running into a wall of opposition from traditional delivery systems. If you could help open this market so that emerging technologies could compete I think there would be several benefits. First, this would encourage competition both on consumer prices as well as in technological entrepreneurship with great benefit to the consumer. Every dollar a consumer can save on a phone, cable or internet bill goes towards something else our family's need. The providers seem happy with both the status quo and in taking s much of our discretionary income as possible. No matter what each of us see the role of government regulation and reach to be, might we agree that universally government should even the playing field and give the "average" American a break? Please be bold here and lead these industries away from the trough. We need your help and if given more choices who knows where our extra savings could go? Gratefully, C.B. Goldsmith University of Texas at El Paso.