

I am writing to express my opposition to the Federal Communications Commission's possible plan to weaken its current policy against indecent radio and television content.

For the common good, I support maintaining, and even strengthening, the current broadcast indecency standard, known as "fleeting expletives," that gives the FCC the much-needed ability to punish television or radio broadcasters for airing even a single instance of profanity or nudity.

Weakening broadcast moral decency standards is the opposite of what a nation needs to remain healthy and strong.

Thank you.
