To Chairman, The Federal Communications Commission (FCC)

It appears we have a very untenable situation regarding today's television viewing. There was the day when women were always careful to be properly clothed when appearing in public or on today's television. However such is no longer the case. Today Women invariably appear on television seated with their legs crossed exposing their thighs up to their waist. If you are not exposed to this behavior then you are not watching television. But you can be sure our children are watching and observing. Women are now appearing wearing the so called mini skirt, properly called the uniform of the prostitute. There was a time in the 1800s when women were careful not to expose their ankle, now they intentionally expose their legs to their backsides. Children watching television are likely to be asking the question "Why don't those ladies have clothes on? Mommie doesn't do that."

It has been my understanding for years that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) is the welcome watch dog of the airways. I can remember the day when so much as an off color word on radio or TV would cause FCC to issue a warning or a citation, if it was bad enough could even revoke a station's operating license.

Where is the FCC today when we need you? Immorality is running ramped on the airways and our FCC seems to be either asleep or wearing blinders.

I am a retired Deputy Director of Communications & Electronics for the Air Force Systems Command Headquarters which was at Andrews Air Force Base at the time. Before retiring some 40 years ago in 1973 I worked closely with the FCC to assure that the Air Force kept a clean house.

It is past time that FCC came to life again and did something to put a stop to this indecent exposure before it gets any worse. And you can be sure it will if not checked.

Sincerely Yours,

Arthur Manning
