

I'm pretty bothered that persistent broadband access is currently treated as anything other than an inalienable right. By allowing some company to profit from something that is as essential as air - we're cheating ourselves of a real chance at a bright future. Instead of asking what we can do for our government, we should ask - why do we have a government if it can't even provide us with something as essential as persistent, universal high speed internet.