I most strongly appose lifting the ban on in-flight cellular calls. Cell phone use in flight will be a nightmare and a torture to the helpless seatmate. Human nature being what it is--rudeness, foul language and incessant loud talking will invade the cell phone user's immediate vicinity. There will be no rest for the fellow traveler, no ability to concentrate on the printed word and no ability to use the time for work. This type of rude and "in-your-face" discourteous behavior is omnipresent already on trains and busses. There is no need to repeat the same mistake in the air. On land transportation, a passenger may move to another seat--there is no chance to get away from a cell phone oaf on a plane. Do not turn the air travel experience into a repeat of the "trapped next to a boom-box" absurdity of the 80's. You got it right the first time by banning cell phones--keep it that way.
