In a consumer-unfriendly industry that has spent the last 10 years shrinking seat width and pitch and then charging a fee for said seat; spent untold dollars fighting a passengers' Bill of Rights; repeatedly merged in the interest of "competition"; that has a CEO that says that that bringing luggage on vacation is "not essential" to travel; that typically charges a $200 fee for using any amount of "credit" from a canceled fare -- and on and on and etc., etc., etc. - I find it astonishing that the flying experience could get any worse.....until I saw this proposal.

As a FF, I'll make a deal with you FAA/FCC. We as the flying public will cede cell phone usage on planes, if as part of the deal Congress passes a law to allow foreign carriers to compete in the domestic market, as noted in this article:
<http://www.usatoday.com/story/travel/flights/2014/01/05/elliott-let-foreign-airlines-fly-domestic-routes/4329825/>.

We're all pretty sick of the industry race to the bottom of the cesspool - cell phone use will only make a less-than-desirable experience worse. Competition can only make it better.

Make us a deal, or please, no cell phone usage on planes.
