

I've been going to the Adirondack Park to canoe, camp, and hike, since 1964. The Park has always held a mystical wilderness allure for me. Even though there are roads and houses and businesses there, they are unobtrusive enough to not disturb the wild beauty of the park. Everything there seems to work in harmony. When the cell towers were first approved to go in the park, they were important for the people who lived and worked there, and they were, for the most part, 'invisible'. Yes, they could be seen, but they were not glaring, and thus acceptably met a happy medium between necessity and the scenic splendor of the park. If the FCC rule is passed that would negate the APA's ability to regulate cell tower size and placement, it will surely take away a good part of the scenic splendor of the Adirondack Park. I truly don't think it is necessary for The Park to have larger, more visible cell towers at the expense of the natural beauty of The Park.

Thank you

Sincerely,
