To whom it may concern:

As has been mentioned in the news, "New mobile opportunities for consumers" is not the question here. Losing respect for fellow human beings is. My first thought was, who is going to make money off of this? Where profits and greed are concerned, nothing is ever done for the benefit of society. Tom Wheeler is thinking about more than keeping up with new technology.

Peace and quiet on flights is a must. I-pads, laptops, kindles, or anything that doesn't emit noise is fine. But to expect passengers, who wish to rest or sleep, to sit next to someone talking on their phone is impossible. As it is, seating space is unbearable. And if someone can talk on their phone, then why can't I play my choice of music out loud for all to hear.

If talking on the phone is so important, then build noise protected phone booth seats which people can pay extra for. The airlines are always looking for every penny they can get from the flying public. Here's a way they can make more money.

We just came back from a bus trip to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, a four and a half hour trip. Two ladies felt it was necessary to let their families know where they were, what they had done the previous two days, etc.. These were not necessary calls or pleasant listening for others. How could you possibly do this to the flying passengers?

With known arrival time, give people the last ten to fifteen minutes to make necessary pick up arrangements. But of course, airlines say that this is the time that they can't use their phones or electronic devices. I suggest that you forget this idea of phone conversations in flight. PLEASE!!!!

Sincerely,

Mr. & Mrs. Leonard Skinger
