

Net Neutrality should be protected at all costs. When there is no competition, like I do not have in my neighborhood, the only “good” thing that can come out is that I will be charged what ever the cable company decides and I have no choice but to pay the extortion fees or live without a connection to the world wide web.

It saddens me to see that the FCC chairman has been bought out by the cable monopolies. If not, there is no possible justification to proposing that “Fast lanes” should be allowed for people who pay for the bandwidth.

This goes against everything that the Internet was built for and around.
