Today you have decided to allow utility companies to extort content providers into paying for bandwidth I have already paid for. You have essentially allowed utilities to double-charge me for what is already some of the most expensive bandwidth in the world.

This is beyond absurd. Let's imagine this was another industry, like an overnight parking lot.

The Comcast parking lot has 100 spaces, but they apparently have sold 1000 people the right to park in those spaces. Rather than increase the size of their parking lot to match their claims of availability, or simply end the practice of selling products and services they cannot provide, they have decided to demand Ford pay them a tariff for every vehicle that Ford owners want to park in the parking lot. If Ford does not pay, Comcast will make life miserable for the Ford owners, maybe put up road blocks and make them late to work every morning. Obviously, if Ford gives in to this extortion, they will pass the cost along to Ford customers, essentially making Ford owners pay twice for that space in that parking lot, perhaps spreading the cost to Ford owners who don't park in that lot, a lot which still remains too small to support all the paying customers. Oh, and did I mention that much of that parking lot was built with taxpayer money in the first place?

Ironically, the way your decision is being sold is that it will allow a "fast lane." Of course, that "fast lane" is the lane I have now, you have simply allowed utilities to artificially slow down traffic and cripple services in order to extort more money out of content providers. It's amazing how many countries on this planet have vastly superior Internet infrastructure without resorting to extortion and toll roads. Perhaps you should study those countries before killing innovation on the Internet back home.

Please, reverse your decision to legalize this extortion.
