The internet is no longer a luxury play thing.
It is essential in a great many parts of life as the telephone was proven to be.
The idea on Net Neutrality is vital to allow universal access to and creation of content in a Democratic society.

Throttling the speed on some sites is no different than speeding up other sites.

The result is different platforms - "Fast" and "Slow" regardless of whether it is done up-front or by a back door.

The internet "carries" an ever larger amount of essential material to and from all of us and therefor is clearly a "common carrier."

Telephone companies did not go broke because they were required to give equal access to all.

In fact, we all benefitted.

The ONLY fair, reasonable, and Democratic course is to ensure total and complete "Net Neutrality" and increase the capacity of inadequate networks rather than preserving the "inadequacy" by charging the privileged few fees to pay for a "fast lane."

"Importance" cannot be equated with "Willingness and ability to pay."
