

7521100298.txt

I am urging the FCC Chairman to protect Net Neutrality. Many of the proposed changes would adversely effect poorer internet users who cannot afford extra fees imposed by ISP's. Our great nation already suffers from a digital divide. this would put internet use further outside of the reach of people who can least afford it. Like watching wireless video? What if your Internet provider could charge you watching video wirelessly or told you there were only certain times of day you could do it? The FCC is now going to have to re-evaluate the true meaning of net neutrality. Does it mean that there should be strict regulations on Internet use, like in the telephone industry?

This ruling could possibly open the doors to different levels of Internet access depending on what you want to pay for, similar to a cable TV package.

Your favorite video sites, search sites, portals, etc. could have to start paying some pretty hefty fees just to be on the Web.

Depending on where you're located and which network you're using (this is a hypothetical situation), anything you send over the Internet might have to be re-routed for more efficient processing, which means slower transmit times.

If your ISP decides to block Web sites, portals, search engines, other ISP's, it can. And you will have to put up with it. Big business and ISP's have all the power already. Please return some to the people.