

7521100680.txt

Chairman Tom Wheeler publicly acknowledges that making the Internet a common carrier is the right thing to do, but he just doesn't wanna: It's too lucrative to auction it off to the highest bidder so he can become an advisor/lobbyist to/for them later.

"Tom Wheeler brings an impressive resume to the table ..." the press release will go.

It's time to Chairman Wheeler to actually do what's right and forgo the payment from his masters, the Comcasts of the world and realize he currently serves the citizens of the entire USA not just a few billionaires. When that is weighted in, nearly 99% ... gee there is that number again want the Internet to be a common carrier. They want net neutrality.

It is interesting to note that the US government approached the private sector companies for help creating the Internet in the first place. They refused, "Not any money to be made." Then. Now that almost everyone is on it, they want it all for themselves and if they get it, there will be no innovation. What would be their incentive to spend money on improving things? That will cut into their insane profits from "slowing" down the Internet. Pay to play.

The privatization of the Internet as the path Chairman Wheeler seems want to go down will lead to an Internet that is less responsive to the needs of most individuals. It would basically be censorship unless one has the means, the free speech err ... the money to remove that barrier.