

7521101291.txt

Hey, guess what? I care about keeping ISPs in check by ensuring they act as a common carrier rather than a toll booth which expedites the Porsche-riding jerks (AOL content) and leaving the crappy Nissans (all sites competing with the ISPs) in the dust.

When I send a letter in the mail, do post office workers check its contents to determine if/when it gets sent? No? Then why are we trying to implement such a system online?

Here's the other thing: destroying net neutrality destroys free speech. It gives a giant megaphone to the large corporations willing to pay an extra buck to meddle their garbage, while granting the ability to silence anyone who disagrees. This has grave consequences.

So long as citizens have few (or no) choice in their internet service provider, I refuse to believe that abolishing net neutrality promotes competition. This utterly is delusional.

Anyway, enact the will of the people. Uphold net neutrality, and reclassify ISPs as common carriers. It's within the FCC's purview, and it's desperately needed to prevent power-hungry companies like AOL/Time Warner and Verizon/Comcast from bilking the public of even more hard-earned money while simultaneously sucker punching the 1st amendment in the face.

Thanks!