I would strongly urge you to not make changes to Net Neutrality laws that would negatively impact equal access for many to the internet and the information and resources contained within it. There already exists a large digital divide at a socioeconomic level, limiting the ability for many individuals to even access the internet.

By altering regulations to allow for a "fast lane" on the internet, a precedent will be set that will impose further barriers on access to quality information and resources to those already struggling to gain even the most limited access. Furthermore, by allowing corporations to, effectively, charge content providers for reliable and speedy access to their consumer base, you are effectively ensuring that end-users will be adversely impacted by increased user and subscription fees.

Content is content. As technology and access to media and resources evolve and advance, and consumers demand access to larger and more complex data streams, the industry must evolve with it. Subscription rates with ISPs are already high. Forcing consumers into a position where they may ultimately have to make a decision to pay more for a better experience not only alienates those who are readily able to access the internet, it virtually guarantees that those who already have limited access to the internet will continue to lag far behind everyone else.
