

7521101682.txt

The internet is easily one of humanity's greatest inventions. It has led to new levels of innovation, invention, and creation that would not have been possible in its absence. And none of these things could have happened with corporations behind it determining who had access to what and at what speed.

The open and free exchange of ideas has been one of the guiding principles of the digital age. This recent FCC ruling would bring a swift end to that. Allowing internet service providers to receive money from corporations for various levels of access and speed would mean that any idea or concept could be stifled if a corporation didn't agree with it. This is, quite simply, not the way the internet should ever work.

The internet has already changed the world, and I well and truly believe the greatest is yet to come. But that can only happen if it remains free and open, with no prejudice given toward or against any part of it, and with no corporate interference determining what people do or don't see. It is my hope that the FCC will reverse this ruling and work to maintain net neutrality. Thank you.